It is an encouraging sign that some tudent groups are working toward winging campus opinion into strong nti-cheating channels. As long as our present competitive A, B, C, D, F sysem of grading is retained, however, to xpect a sudden change to a thoroughly nonest campus would be the height of olly. Many members of the weaker class of students have never had a sense of values when scholastic dishonesty is concerned and cannot be expected to acquire such a sense of values overnight.

In these times of objective quizzes and commercialized competition for grade points, which today is heightened by Selective Service requirements, the urge to cheat is powerful and quite often irresistable. Moralizing and preaching will, much of the time, fall on deaf ears.

Something that will work, though, is friendliness and understanding between instructors and students. That takes time, in fact never ends, but it should never be overlooked.

Along with the friendliness, instructors should provide adequate supervision and safeguards to deter the dishonest element. A University dean said Monday that "the whole setup is something like a bank. They don't leave money lying around because they know everyone can't be trusted. Likewise, in quizzes, all precautions should be taken. Precautions aren't an insult in a bank, and they shouldn't be an insult in a quiz."

Some people will be inconvenienced, but these suggestions sent to faculty members by the Dean of Student Life and the Chairman of the Discipline Committee have considerable merit:

1. Do not leave questions in offices overnight; and the least possible time should elapse between construction of the examination questions and using them, with questions in the personal possession of the instructor in the interim.

Solving problems from math books is a minor detail compared to the task of printing the book itself, which was the project of Dr. Edwin Titt, associate professor of applied mathematics and astronomy. In composing his 230page textbook, he had to use specially built typewriter, equipped with Greek letters, math symbols, and a half-space roller, in addition to the regular keyboard. He also had to use a Varityper to supplement the typewriter, and a speed-o-scope for making drawings in the text.

The difficult task paid off. The cost of publication was tenth of that of the usual process. The book is now being used by engi-neering students at the university for advanced math courses.

'Up-or-Out' Clause DependsonScreening

By MARJORIE CLAPP

"Up-or-out."

There's no middle road for today's aspiring University teacher. Either he's efficient, or he isn't. Either he advances within a certain period, or he leaves.

That's the condition which instructors and assistant professors come to the University these days. And it's one of the most ironclad laws on the Forty Acres.

Such a law-known to the lay-man as the "up-or-out" rulecame into being on this campus in 1945 simultaneously with similar rulings at other universities all over the country. The original plan for such action had been in effect in several colleges before

At that time, the rule stipulated that both instructors and assistant professors must be advanced one rank higher at the end of a four year period or be placed on terminal appointment-a nice way of putting "fired."

In 1949, the ruling was amended by extending the four-year period for assistants to sixprompted by the charge that teaching loads prevented creative research in the shorter period.

The rule now stands that after four years of teaching, an instructor, if qualified, must be advanced to the rank of assistant professor. In turn, an assistant professor, if qualified after six years of teaching, must be advanced to the rank of associate.

Outright critics of the rule argue that many brilliant young teachers, who have yet to reach their proficiency as researchists, are lost and hampered in their careers. But the University administration is apparently pleased with the system thus far, and a minimum of teachers have been discharged under the plan. This year, twelve persons were advanced to associate professor rank; four were made special instructors (comparable to a rank advance); and four were placed on terminal appointment. The latter status end of the stipulated period, will not be advanced is placed on the budget for the next year. During that year, he is to secure a posielsewhere for the coming

The entire purpose of the ruling, states Dr. J. C. Dolley, University vice-president, is to screen junior staff members to determine whether or not they will be a success on this campus. If investigation proves their ability, then teachers are promoted with more rapidity than they would be other-

"It (the rule) benefits both the University and the teacher. By screening teachers in this manner, we are able to insure better teaching methods and secure people who will advance on the academic ladder," states Dr. Dolley.

In addition, the rule helps the individual. If he cannot rise to a modicum of success here, his services may enable him to rise to a higher position elsewhere. In other words, he is not given false hopes about a career here.

Just how the efficiency and capacity of an instructor is determined seems to involve a concensus of opinion. The chief agency in the screening, however, is the budget council of each department-which determines the monetary expense for the forthcoming year. The council relies on a teacher's colleagues for information, as well as personal interviews with the individual concerned.

Then the dean of the school may be asked for his opinion. With these opinions goes examination of research and creative inclinations. In many departments -particularly the sciences the amount of research and published findings is a determining factor.

Critics attack the research stipulation strongly. They maintain that time spent on research -sometimes superfluous to the teacher's interest-deducts from teaching responsibilities. Teaching is, after all, the chief duty of a ing is often done, they point out, simply because it is necessary to advancement—and hence of ne real value.

Instructors—particularly your ones—fail to meet the research requirement, Dr. Dolley adds.

If an instructor is properly screened, then little investig should be needed when an assistant is advanced, he says.

A "terminal appointment" does not necessarily lessen a teacher's chances of finding a job at some other college, he believes. "Generally, the case would probably be that the teacher did not meet our qualifications for a field on which we place great importance. Another school may stress a different phase." The "up-or-out" clause can and will work successfully, he con-cludes, if the screening is thorough and proper.

By that, human sympathies and kindliness—and consideration of the teacher's personal environment and problems must be ignored by those doing the screening. These plus the teacher's social position and personality.

That can be a pretty difficult
